FRIEKE JANSSENS

Frieke Janssens has build up a solid reputation in staged photography during the past two decades. A precise staging is her trademark, next to an impeccable command over the technique and a perfect completion. Janssens' visual language is surprising, playful and made with a great sense of humour. Above all, her work witnesses often a tension and an unspoken tragic undercurrent.

Many communication- and advertising agencies make an appeal to her refreshing, original ideas for the production of covers, posters and adverts. She works for a large range of clients in both the commercial as the cultural sector (as Wieden+Kennedy London, Duval Guillaume, Publicis Conseil Paris, Canvas, KLARA, De Standaard Magazine, Weekend Knack, Toneelhuis, BMW, Museum M, Channel 4, Stromae, Theater aan zee).

In addition to her commissioned work, her personal oeuvre has also gained worldwide interest. The Intoxicated series (2010) is set in the twilight zone of consciousness and unconsciousness. Janssens manages to counter the stiff posing and lack of spontaneity caused by the presence of cameras by photographing intoxicated models. The contrast between artificial lighting and honest body language is striking. Janssens does not shun controversy. In Smoking Kids (2011), she asks young kids to "smoke" while posing before the camera. The photographer plays with different cultural registers associated with the act of smoking. In Your Last Shot (2012), Janssens convinces people to sit for a serene portrait, photographing them as they want to be remembered. In her Dianas series (2015), Janssens works with single women who imagine themselves as "predators" in their "hunt" for men. One of her most touching works this year was Animalcoholics. Janssens created a large surrealistic panorama of drunk animals. When human beings drink alcohol, it doesn't take long before the varnish of civilisation is stripped away and they plunge into a state of bestiality. Do animals have the same need to escape as humans?

Her patient devotion results in narrative scenes.

This exhibition gives an insight in the evolution of my work which is characterised by meticulous staging and a sense of humor. The number one rule in photography, never work with animals or children, is one I happily ignore. There's no greater testament to my ever-growing love for photography than all the images in this exhibition.

WORK HIGHLIGHTS

ANIMALCOHOLICS

2016 personal art project voor #Trademarks2016 #stadstriënnale

As people drink, they lose their self control and self consciousness, their primal instincts appear, and they become more like animals. For her latest mind bending work ANIMALCOHOLICS, Frieke Janssens, as in her famous Smoking Kids series, tackles addiction and social changes. This time, she reflects on alcohol as a socially accepted drug and its position in modern society, creating a large, surrealist panorama in which she takes alcohol out of its human context, capturing imagined animals in a state of intoxication that one might see in a bar. Do animals need an escape as humans do?

YOUR LAST SHOT. 2012

No one likes to think about their own death. And especially not about the photo they will be remembered by on their grave. Photographer Frieke Janssens wants to change people's mindsets when it comes to that particular photo: 'your last shot'. "In reality, those left behind need to find a photo quickly that is 'ok' and usually it requires some Photoshop retouching. And the guestion remains: how would the deceased feel about this photo? Maybe he or she would have untagged themselves from it?" The series of 'Your Last Shot' will reflect a combination of the portrayed's wishes and the photographer's style. "My personal preference goes to static portraits as they were taken at the occasion of weddings at the beginning of the 20th century. My aim is to make an iconic portrait that is beautiful, serene and fearless, preferably with a gentle smile, indicating that the model is clearly aware of the fact that this portrait will be used for a very long time to come." Sinister? "Not really, life and death are inevitably linked. In Belgium there still seems to be a taboo around the thought of death. As a photographer, I feel that the moment when one reflects about their own death is a precious moment to be shared and portrayed." The portrayed will receive their 'last portrait' printed on porcelain, so that it actually can be used when the time has come. Which is hopefully many years from now. "In each series, I try to make people reflect on a specific subject. Should we not care more about that one photo that will be used infinitely? Would you not prefer to choose that photo yourself? By the way, it strikes me that, when people visit someone's grave, they like to take a walk through the entire cemetery. And what do they do? Indeed, looking at the pictures.

SMOKING KIDS, 2011 PERSONAL

A YouTube video of a chainsmoking Indonesian toddler inspired me to create this series, "Smoking Kids". The video highlighted the cultural differences between the east and west, and questioned notions of smoking being a mainly adult activity. Adult smokers are the societal norm, so I wanted to isolate the viewer's focus upon the issue of smoking itself. I felt that children smoking would have a surreal impact upon the viewer and compel them to truly see the acts of smoking rather than making assumptions about the person doing the act. Coincidentally around the time of the "Smoking Kids" gallery opening, a law was passed, and smoking has been banned from Belgian bars. There was an outcry from the public about government intervention, feelings that freedom was being oppressed, and that adults were being treated like children. With health reasons driving many cities to ban smoking, the culture around smoking has a retro feel, like the time period of "Mad Men," when smoking on a plane or in a restaurant was not unusual. The aesthetics of smoke and the particular way smokers gesticulate with their hands and posture cannot be denied, but among the different tribes of "Smoking Kids," - Glamour, Jazz, and The Marginal - there is a nod to less attractive aspects, on the line between the beauty and ugliness of smoking. To assure you of the safety of the children, there were no real cigarettes on set. Instead, chalk and sticks of cheese were the prop stand ins, while candles and incense provided the wisps of smoke.

THE INTOXICATED. 2009 PERSONAL

My aim was to make drunk portraits out of the context of a bar. I was looking for nuanced, honest emotions - without the self-control and self-consciousness people usually exhibit when posing in front of a camera. In these photos, this was accomplished through alcohol. People are more honest when they are under the influence. Not only in what they say, but also in how they pose. With actual alcohol running trough the subject's veins, the contrast between the artificially lighted pictures and the honesty of the poses is the essence of this series. Before every shot I know exactly how I want to portray someone, which angle, which light and which feeling I'm looking for. Knowing that I never can find the truth in a portrait. It was new for me to lose control of my subjects. When I asked to look a little bit to the left, their head turned completely in profile. And they were talking about everything to me. So it was difficult to concentrate, because there were lots of absurd situations. Now I'm more conscious about how to photograph people, something I never gave much attention before this series. I want to go deeper into this theme about the consciousness and unconsciousness in relation to photography, but also in film.
